Lalo (Tony Dalton) was always a class gentleman. The guy who kills people. Credit...Greg Lewis/AMC, through Sony Pictures Television After seven weeks, "Best Call Saul" resumed exactly where he left - in the apartment of Jimmy and Kim, with Howard Hamlin dead on the ground and Lalo Salamanca holding the murder weapon. We soon learn that the silkies Salamanca, a highly charismatic sociopath, has come with an elaborate scheme, which has presumably refined for many days hidden in the Albuquerque sewer system. He'll send an involuntary killer across the city to shoot Gus Fring, so the cavalry is sent to the condominium of Jimmy and Kim. With weights like Mike out of position, Lalo was free to infiltrate Fring's superlab. It was a plausible plan, and it yielded credulity once. When Lalo enters the laundry that hides the superlab, he manages to evade the surveillance system designed to prevent the incursion he is throwing. This is sold as a lucky moment for Mr. Salamanca, who doesn't seem to realize he was almost seen in video camera. After that, action follows the same logic as a West, a kingdom in which the unlikely is expected. Gus determines that Lalo is inside the laundry about four milliseconds before Lalo starts shooting Gus's armed security. Then Gus delays his own execution with a monologue on the viality and stupidity of the Salamanca, a tactic that gives him time to kick a lighting cable, dip the lab in an almost total darkness and recover the gun that is secreted during an earlier visit. Your faithful Recapper needed to see the shooting again three times to see that, yes, Gus finds his gun and fire in Lalo. If we weren't clearly in the realm of a High Noon-styleOne could ask how a murderer as successful as Lalo lost the advantage of the advantage. He squeezed. squeezed. A few shots before Gus even got to his gun. The reality is that Gus had a big advantage in this confrontation, and had nothing to do with his chops as a shooter. I couldn't die because he's alive by "Breaking Bad." I had a future to live. It is the reason that the authentic suspense has been sporadic, at best, since "Best Call Saul" began. For example, Jimmy has had some nearby calls—almost killed by Tuco Salamanca in the debut episode of the series; he almost fell from heat strokes in the desert dragging millions of dollars in a sack last season — but the tension in existential moments is not the variety of nail bites. Everyone knows Jimmy's gonna live. What makes Lalo's death so fascinating. With five remaining episodes, the main plot pilot — the search for Lalo's revenge — no longer drives. What's left? Only Hector knows Lalo was alive. All the others in the family are convinced that Lalo died in that domestic invasion, largely because Lalo did such a compelling job of vanishing his own death, to the right of leaving a corpse that looked like him and left behind almost identical dental records. (Remember the wife of that poor Mexican peasant, thanking Lalo for the bankruptcy of her husband's dental work? Yeah. Lalo had a plan gone long before he needed it.) Without a doubt, Fring will face some obstacles, but writers have a remarkable latitude to create them. More than that, they can draw their attention to Gene Takovic, the joyless twitch Saul becomes after "Breaking Bad", which was last seen working as manager of a Cinnabon in Omaha, convinced that his cover had been blown. Whatever happens to Takovic, he doesn't have the "problem of the future" that limited Jimmy/Saul. What will happen to Jimmy/Saul/Gene is someone's guess. I do. Come on with Kim. It's never mentioned in "Breaking Bad."
